Chapter 8: One-Eyed Tribe

Perhaps you could say that my having discovered rumors of a 'One-Eyed Tribe' was the greatest result of a year-long safari expedition in Africa.

Following a complex winding route through Okavango Swamp, we approached our destination.

Along the way, there were no encounters with any wild animals to speak of, and it was the picture of boredom, but my heart was bubbling like that of an adolescent boy.

Unknown even to the nearby Maun tribe, it was truly a new frontier.

Aside from being isolated from modern civilization, would there be a unique culture rooted there...? It was the moment of truth.

However, when the One-Eyed Tribe finally showed themselves, I was rather nonplussed.

Their clothing was all the same: Westernized polo shirts and cotton shorts--there were even some wearing Japanese-made wristwatches. There were about twenty in the tribe, each one an adult male with a cut physique.

At the rate, it would be more correct to record that they were simply a group of men living communally for a while, rather than some kind of tribe.

But what was surprising was not their garments, but rather their lifestyle.

I couldn't sense in them an atom of the liveliness of the Tswana people, who love song and dance above all. They are so punctual that they would make Japanese businessmen lose face. Arising every morning at the same time, finishing their meals, they were almost military-like in their discipline, spending day and night tending the Toro potatoes.

The peculiar brigade has an even stranger characteristic.

As the name implies, they are all missing an eye.

Their right eyes are clouded over, half of their vision robbed. It would seem that this is a syndrome specific to the region.

I am no specialist on parasites, but I deduced that this is probably a variant of Onchocerca disease (river blindness).

They continue to work together, even while they fall victim to a mysterious disease. Why? No women or children exist here. Why?

These questions floating in my head were soon resolved when I tried interrogating them.

...for this is a type of penal colony.
